There was 6.200 under arms, not including the numerous agents of the police, who were so stationed as to preled for, he was willing to produce, but others he considered desirable for the public service to withhold. His lordship observed, in conclusion, that though success had hitherto attended the efforts of England fer peace, at the same time, this country was still fully prepared in a locoming attitude as regarded every state in Europe.

Sir R. Light expressed much sympathy for Doland, and said that England and France ought to guarantee her nationality, in conformity with the treaty of Vienna.

After farther debate between Sir E. Codrington Lord Sandon, Mr. Roebuck, Mr. Stratford Canning, Mr. P. M. Stewart, and Mr. Ewart, the question was put, when it was agreed to furnish the treaties, but the correspondence, was withheld.
